Hades

Where we go when he closes up his eyes and under what canopy,
some blue shadow, firmer than hell,
a landscape of absence and mist and stone.
There are no bodies here, we dream shapeless dreams—a constant, cloudless storm.

Mothers, I'll never wake up from him,
I have already traveled too far.
My mouth is the color of his mouth and his arms are no longer his arms; they're made of smoke, as my first white dress, and the spot of his name, once freckled, dissolves on my tongue like sugar, like honey, like whisper in Hades.
